

Creative Routine:

My creative routine has been a mix of consistency and chaos lately, which honestly fits the theme of this project. I've been trying to stay creative each week, whether that's writing, freestyling, or sketching out ideas. Some weeks, I hit a flow easily; other weeks, I'm just trying to make time between school and work. Even when I'm tired, I've learned that doing something small — like jotting down a rhyme or beat idea — helps keep my creativity alive. It's less about being perfect and more about staying in motion.

Project Experience:

Working on this project was actually a lot of fun. I wanted my “worst song” to sound like a real song that just went a little off the rails — something funny, chaotic, and confident. Once I started writing “Spilled My Coffee,” I leaned into humor and relatability instead of worrying about how “good” it sounded. Performing it was awkward at first, but once I started moving and rapping, it turned into pure fun. The fear of looking silly disappeared when I remembered the point was to create without judgment. I laughed at my mistakes and kept going, and that made it one of the most enjoyable assignments so far.
